The Life of a Snowbird: Escaping the Cold for a Warmer Haven

Winter can be harsh in the northern states. With the cold weather, slippery roads, and snow piling up on the driveways, it's no wonder many northerners choose to pack their bags and head towards the warmer southern states. These people are known as snowbirds, and for several months every winter, they make their temporary homes in these areas, choosing to leave the harsh northern winters behind to soak up the sun, enjoy outdoor activities, and relax near the beach or golf courses.

But not all snowbirds are retirees, some travel south for a few weeks or months, while others take advantage of remote work. Another advantage of being a snowbird is that you can visit family and friends who live in warmer areas during the winter months and give them a break from hosting during the holidays.
